

SCRIBBLES.

fragments written between 2019 — 2026

- by necksa

SCRIBBLES.

-by necksa

Closure is a myth invented by optimists. the truth is endings don't close they echo. you can silence the music, but melody lingers in the architecture. Her absence isnt a gap; it's an empire. every morning is a rehearsal of restraint, every night a negotiation with ghosts.

How strangely beautiful life feels when you know she will never be yours yet every time you see her, she still looks like she was made for you.

"When you love someone, you can't just tell them," he said.

"What do you mean?" his friend asked.

"If you say 'I love you', how are they supposed to understand?

It's like trying to comprehend the universe.

You have to show them quietly.

A coffee.

An extra day off.

Room to stand under the same umbrella.

Take the universe apart and give them the stars."

I want to understand you in ways no one ever thought to try.

"I keep waiting for the right moment to tell you this, but maybe there's no such thing.

Just me, standing here with my heart in my hands, confessing, You feel like home. And I don't know if love is supposed to be this terrifying, but I know I'd rather be scared with you than safe without you. So here I am All yours, if..you'll have me."

It drives me crazy how humans are just meant to hold each other. how come when you hold someone's hand, your fingers just perfectly lock with theirs? how is it that when you hug someone, your face fits just right in the crook of their neck? how can your hands cup someone's face like that's their only primary function? it cannot be coincidence that our bodies are fully capable of holding another... we were designed to love

In my dream, you rested your head on my lap and I gently brushed my fingers through your hair. You were quiet, more at peace than I'd ever seen you before. Your scent surrounded me and I felt like I was in the safest place in the world. You took my hand and placed it on your chest. I could feel your heartbeat, stronger and more real than it had ever been before.

Then I saw the tears in your eyes. You sat up suddenly, burying your face in the crook of my neck. I realised you weren't the kind of person who didn't know how to cry or someone who hid their feelings; you just carried them too deeply, too quiet for the world to see. I didn't ask why, I didn't expect anything. I just let you cry, let it all out. Your tears soaked into my skin as I held you, patting your back gently.

After a while, you pulled back, your eyes red-rimmed but calmer. "Now you have to go," you said, and I woke up. But still, I can feel the warmth of your head on my lap, the moist of your tears on my neck. I wish you'd come back, even if only in my dreams...

Have you ever felt a potential love for someone?

Like, you don't actually love them and you know you don't, but you know you could. You realise that you could easily fall in love with them. It's almost like the bud of a flower, ready to blossom but it's just not quite there yet.

And you like them a lot, you really do. You think about them often, but you don't love them. You could, though.

You know you could.

I still catch traces of her songs
she ruined,
phrases she infected, places i avoid because walls
remember. Moving on isn't freedom; it's just coexistence with the ghost of wht refused to finish properly.

I have carried entire libraries inside my chest,
memorized the language of grief,
the dialect of longing,

Yet nothing has ever felt more alive than your name
finding its way back to my lips.

I used to think the cosmos was beautiful, until I realized ever constellation was merely a failed attempt at becoming her.

And if my ribs become a cage for maggots they'll learn the rhythm of your laughter and mistake it for their own pulse.

"omg you remembered?"

did you know that if you cut me up and looked into my heart you would find a small red door that opens into a room plastered with everything you've ever said to me and it's all covered in glitter and fairy lights and paper stars. so yeah, I did remember

they injected me with mental illness when i was a baby because they didn't like that i radiated moonlight and had stars inside my eyes. they were jealous of me.

And if someone does grow to love me one day, I hope it is because of the kind of person I have become, not the features I was destined to have. I didn't choose the curve of my smile, but I hope I am loved for the cozy hugs I give. I didn't choose the color of my skin, but I hope I am loved for the scars. I didn't choose the color of my eyes, but I hope I am loved for the warmth reflected in them. I didn't choose the way my features align, but I hope I am loved for all that I am beneath the flesh and bones I possess. I hope I am loved for my intelligence, for the love I carry, for the uncountable hobbies that keep me sane-for the things that make me so imperfect, so human. I pray to be loved as a soul rather than a trophy kept for show.